Text — Media and Society

Journalism has changed dramatically in the twenty-first century. Traditional newspapers (12)_____ fewer copies than they did twenty years ago, but online news sites (13)_____ millions of readers every day. Some journalists worry that speed is now more important (14)_____ accuracy.

Social media allows anyone to share information instantly. However, not everything that goes viral is true. Experts advise readers to check (15)_____ least two reliable sources before believing a shocking headline. Critical thinking has become (16)_____ essential skill for modern citizens.

Television remains popular, although young people increasingly prefer streaming platforms. Documentaries and drama series produced for the web often explore social issues (17)_____ were rarely shown on mainstream channels. Subtitles help viewers improve their foreign language skills while they watch.

Advertising pays for much of the content we consume free of charge. Companies track our preferences and show personalised ads, (18)_____ some users find disturbing. Privacy laws have been tightened in several countries, yet many people still do not read the terms they agree (19)_____ when they install an app.

Education programmes now teach media literacy in schools. Students learn to identify bias, recognise propaganda, and write balanced essays. Teachers say these lessons help pupils become more responsible (20)_____ they grow up.

If schools (21)_____ not invest in digital skills, graduates may struggle in the job market. Employers expect candidates to communicate clearly online and to use collaboration tools. A recent survey found that graduates who completed internships were (22)_____ (likely) to find work within six months.

Looking ahead, artificial intelligence may write simple news reports, but human editors will still be needed to verify facts and (23)_____ ethical decisions. The best journalists combine curiosity with integrity. They remind us that a free press supports democracy (24)_____ giving citizens the information they need.

Finally, readers should remember that consuming news is not the same (25)_____ understanding it. Taking time to reflect on what we read—rather than reacting immediately—leads to better public debate. This habit is worth cultivating, (26)_____ life is busy and notifications constantly demand our attention.

Many universities now offer master's programmes in communication studies. Applicants must demonstrate strong reading skills and a good command (27)_____ English. The EBI is one way to prove that command, (28)_____ it focuses on reading and language use in context.

Candidates who prepare systematically usually perform better than those who rely (29)_____ luck. They practise timed tasks, review their mistakes, and build vocabulary (30)_____ topic. Success is possible even for learners who start at A2, provided they work consistently for several weeks.
