1. Career Connect is a twice-yearly event where final-year students and recent graduates meet representatives from over 120 companies. Recruiters from finance, engineering, healthcare, and the creative industries attend. The next event takes place at the National Convention Centre on 25 November. Attendees are advised to bring printed CVs and prepare a short personal introduction.

2. The OpenLearn Project has made over 900 university-level course modules freely available online, including lecture recordings, reading lists, and practice assessments. The initiative targets learners who cannot access traditional higher education due to cost, location, or time constraints. Certificates of completion are available for a small administrative fee.

3. A growing number of universities have replaced traditional end-of-year examinations with continuous assessment through portfolios, presentations, and collaborative projects. Supporters argue that this approach better reflects the skills employers actually seek. Critics warn that without standardised testing, comparing achievement across institutions becomes problematic.

4. Counselling Plus has expanded its provision at fifteen universities across the country, adding online therapy sessions, peer support groups, and a 24-hour text-based crisis service. Demand for student mental health support has risen by 40% in three years. The scheme is jointly funded by universities and a government initiative.

5. The government has announced a review of secondary-level qualifications, with proposals to broaden subject combinations and reduce reliance on end-of-course exams. Pilot schools will begin testing the new framework in September. Full national implementation is expected by 2028.

6. A fast-growing technology company is offering a 30-week intensive training programme for career-changers with no previous coding experience. Trainees receive a salary during training and are guaranteed a role on successful completion. The scheme was developed in direct response to a national shortage of software engineers.

Task 2 — Multiple Choice (Questions 7-11)

Text: Young People and the Environment

Young people today are more aware of environmental issues than any previous generation. Climate change, plastic pollution, and biodiversity loss are topics they encounter daily — in school, on social media, and in the news. Many feel a deep sense of responsibility to act, even when governments and businesses appear slow to respond.

In several countries, student-led campaigns have achieved notable results. Pressure from young activists has led some city councils to ban single-use plastics in public spaces, invest in cycling infrastructure, and commit to carbon-neutral targets ahead of official deadlines. These victories show that grassroots action can influence policy at the local level.

However, environmental concern alone does not always translate into changed behaviour. Research suggests that young people who are most worried about climate change are not necessarily those who reduce their own carbon footprint the most. Convenience, cost, and social norms continue to shape everyday choices.

Educators argue that combining emotional awareness with practical skills is the most effective approach. Teaching young people how to calculate their carbon footprint, choose sustainable products, and engage with local decision-makers may produce more lasting change than simply raising alarm.

7. According to the text, why do young people feel responsible for environmental issues?

• A) Bec

8. What have student-led campaigns achieved in some cities?

9. What does research suggest about young people's behaviour?
